The gross features of oral leukoplakias are typical, but even in the absence of architectural change or cytological atypia, an appreciation of pathophysiology is essential if a confident diagnosis of leukoplakia is to be made. Therefore, the histological features of leukoplakia are described in detail here. The following features on biopsy may suggest a diagnosis of leukoplakia: (1) asymmetry of abnormal epithelium with reduced parakeratinization and extension of abnormal epithelium into the underlying connective tissue papillary space; (2) the infiltrating epithelium appears to be trapped within collagen bundles; (3) fibrosis is apparent at the base of the lesion; (4) isolated chronic inflammatory cells are present; and (5) vascular changes characteristic of chronic inflammation may be seen. The latter may include adventitial mononuclear cell infiltrates with pigmented cells and/or intraluminal leukocytoclastic vasculitis. The importance of these features is underlined by the fact that they appear in the majority of cases in which the diagnosis of "lichenoid changes of oral mucosa" is made, and they may occur more frequently than the more typical changes that might be expected in lichenoid lesions.
